five miles through forests and fields. A playful young shepherd dog accompanied them, and, as soon as they entered the woods, near the base of the hill, they took the strap off of the dog's neck and let him run wherever he chose to, but keeping him within sight. When they got to the top of the hill they sat down on their sleds to rest, and while thus seated they heard the dog making a noise a few rods away as though he was at play with another dog. The boys whistled for him, but he did not come,

and that surprised them.

Hiram and Cyrus then left their sleds and hurried into the thicket, where they found the dog rolling and tumbling in the snow with a small cub bear. The cub was just as fall of play as the dog, and they didn't let up a particle at the presence of the boys. Mr. Whitlock's sons were completely carried away with the antics of the two young animals who had got so well two young animals who had got so well acquainted in such a short time, and for several minutes they stood and watched them. Then Hiram began to realize that there would be lots of trouble for their young dog, and possibly for themselves, if the cub's mother should suddenly pop in upon them, and he said he guessed he would state up the dog and take him away. snatch up the dog and take him away.

"What's the matter with takin' the cub along, too?" said Cyrus. "He ain't much bigger'n the dog, an' I could carry him un-der me arm till we got out o' the woods, an' then we could make him walk."

Hiram thought it over a minute, and then said they would try it. So Cyrus crept slyly up behind the cub and grabbed it, and Hiram ran back after the sieds. While he was gone the cub began to whimper and to try his best to get away, but Cyrus held on to him firmly, and the little deg, who seemed to think the cub was an extraordi nary playfellow, hopped up and down and barked, as much as to say that he wanted to have the cub put down so that he could play with it more. On their way through the woods the boys took turns at carrying the cub. It was a good deal heavier than it the cub. looked to be when they saw it rolling around with the dog, and, as they had to climb over many rocks and fallen trees, they were pretaying, and Butcher Knives, &c., Gunn and A fall and complete stock of first-to the first open field. But they had made up their minds to take the little captive over to their Uncle phineas's, if nothing prevented them; and Phineas's, if nothing prevented them; and as soon as they got to the clearing they hitched their sieds together, tied the still whining cub fast to the top of the front sled, made the dog stop his noise, and started on a trot across the field, dragging the sleds and cub behind them.

It was a mighty sight more fun than they had expected to get out of the journey over to their uncle's, and they enjoyed it greatly, laughing heartily, and telling one another how astonished their uncle and aunt would be when they put the little cub down in the door-yard, and what they were going to do with the cub after that. Presently they reached the brow of a hill, and then they both got on the sleds with the cub between them and rode to the foot, the dog keeping close to them. A short distance from there they had to ascend another hill, and they took a good rest in the hollow before they As they were about to move alon started. Cyrus glanced back to the top of the hill down which they had coasted and saw something that made his eyes bulge out. He something that made his eyes burge out. Just then the dog barked like everything, for no apparent reason, and the dog's noise made the cub cry louder than it had yet done. The little captive's cries reached the new of the ald captive's cries reached the ears of the old bear, and a few seconds later she was tearing down the hill at a rate that made the lads shudder. The dan er they were in flashed before them as quick as a wink, and they seized the rope and rushed up the hill a little faster than they had intended to do, looking back evary few steps te see how the big bear was getting along.

When they were about half way up the hill they saw that the old bear was bound to overhaul them before they got to the top, and so they let go the rope and hastened to get as far away as possible. As soon as they dropped the rope the sleds ran backward down the hill, and when they passed the mother bear she recognized her whimpering cub, and, turning about, she followed the Define the field of the field o the sleds came to a stop the old bear was at
